Milk was well within its use-by date. Same coffee I always use (instant, okay, don't mock the afflicted... freshly boiled water from the cold portion of the tap). I busted into my emergency stock of UHT milk, and THAT curdled too! The uht curdled in smaller chunks than the regular milk. Could there be something weird going on with my tap water?

Almond milk is great for everything else but too thin for coffee and doesn't work. Soy is a hormone disrupter, so not an option! Not into powdered creamers.... they taste of chemicals, same with the Califa Farms Almond milk is my favorite Almond milk... but their coffee creamer.... nasty to my taste! Also tastes like chemicals. Yuk!

At the end of the day, ice cream is basically frozen milk and sugar—which is what you'd be putting into your coffee anyway. Plop a spoonful of it in your coffee and stir, and if it's chocolate, even better! You're basically making yourself a mocha. You could even get fancy with it and say you're making yourself an affogato.

When drinking a coffee I always prefer having small amount of milk on it. There is no problem of having a milk on it but just add small amount only because the cow's milk is originally made up of fat. And its not just fat but a wide variety combination of various types of fats. There is also have a protein in it which is good to our body.
