The Tank, Infantry, Mk I, Matilda I (A11) was a British infantry tank of the Second World War. Despite being slow, cramped and only armed with a single machine gun, the Matilda I had some success in the Battle of France in 1940, owing to its heavy armour which was proof against the standard German anti-tank guns. It is not to be confused with the later model Tank, Infantry Mk II, also known as the "Matilda II", which took over the "Matilda" name after the Matilda I was withdrawn from combat serv

Matilda I (tank) - Wikipedia

The former Infantry Tank Mk.I was a product of the 1929 financial crisis, a rather limited and compromised vehicle, badly suited to real battlefield operations. In 1936 it entered production. During the very same year, another parallel specification (A12) asked for a larger, better-armed model, derived from the A7 prototype.

Matilda, Infantry Tank Mark II - Tank Encyclopedia

Matilda's side and rear armour was relatively heavy even at the end of the war, when tanks like the M4 Sherman carried about 40 mm, and late models of the Panther carried 50 mm. The shape of the nose armour was based on Christie's designs and came to a narrow point with storage lockers

Modelling the Matilda Infantry Tank by Mark Bannerman | Book

The first production "tank" (then known as a "landship") was born in the UK during World War 1. In the conflict, the tank proved a mixed bag of results, fielded to break the stalemate of trench warfare by simply running over defenses, passing over open trenches and overwhelming enemy positions through brute strength while in support of infantry offensives.

The A12 Infantry Tank Mark II, or Matilda II, as it was affectionately known, was designed to support infantry – and it was excellent at it. What it lacked in speed and manoeuvrability, it made up for in armour. The Matilda II gained notoriety in North Africa, where it was instrumental in sweeping aside the Italians during Operation Compass.
