The Weekly War Newsmagazines And

In The Weekly War, James Landers provides the first in-depth investigation of how the three major newsmagazines—Newsweek, Time, and U.S. News & World Report—covered the Vietnam War and the impact their coverage had on the American public, presidents, and policymakers. From March 1965 through January 1973 these magazines reached nearly one-third of adult Americans—second only to news programs on network television.

While network television news has garnered significant scholarly and colloquial attention, James Landers argues that the weekly newsmagazines—Time, Newsweek, and U.S. News and World Report—played a crucial, and underrated, role. To correct the oversight, Landers examined almost nine hundred articles on Vietnam published in the three publications during the period of formal military intervention, conducted interviews with eight journalists and three of President Lyndon B. Johnson's staff ...
